Historical Sketch

The Presbyterian Church of Canada was formed in 1844 as a result of the Disruption of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in Connection with the Church of Scotland. The denomination is frequently referred to as the Free Church, both by historians and by contemporary churches and individuals, although the denomination itself never officially used the term. The Presbyterian Church of Canada joined with the United Presbyterian Church of Canada (Accession #1973-1043) to form the Canada Presbyterian Church (Accession #1973-1045) in 1861.

The 1844 Disruption in Canada followed the 1843 Disruption of the Church of Scotland which produced the Free Church of Scotland. The 1843 Disruption centred on the issue of patronage in the call of a minister to a congregation. The Free Church of Scotland argued that the church should be established and supported by state funding but should not be under state control. In Canada this was only a theoretical issue as the Presbyterian churches were not established but loyalties to the different groups in the Church of Scotland - the "Moderates" who remained in the Established Church and the "Evangelicals" who formed the Free Church - raised the issue. The Canadian Disruption was triggered by visits by the Rev. Robert Burns and other representatives of the Free Church of Scotland seeking support in the colonial churches. The argument which was used by the Free Church supporters in Canada was that the church should no longer be connected with a Scottish church but instead should be an independent denomination - hence the rejection of the name "Free Church". In practice, however, the Presbyterian Church of Canada established close links with the Free Church of Scotland while the continuing Presbyterian Church of Canada in Connection with the Church of Scotland maintained its links with the Church of Scotland.
